That which we honor in our soldier dead is the ideal of courageous devotion and sacrifice in the country's service. Perhaps the heroism is even greater that sustains a man through wearing service in a foreign land that called forth in times of great popular excitement in the immediate defence of his own people. Certainly the men who are enduring exile and privation and facing disease and death under the tropic sons call not less on our affectionate sympathy and grate fal recognition than those around whom sesociation with great events
